

On a scorching summer day, a thirsty crow flew over the land in search of water.

The sun blazed overhead, and the crow grew tired and desperate.

The crow peered into the pitcher but found that the water level was too low. No matter how hard it tried, its beak couldn't reach the water. It had to think of a clever solution.

The crow spotted small pebbles nearby and had an idea. It picked up a pebble with its beak and dropped it into the pitcher. Slowly, the water level began to rise.

The crow patiently continued dropping pebbles, and eventually, the water rose high enough for it to drink. With persistence and clever thinking, the crow quenched its thirst and flew away happily.
